Overview

The Department of Asian and Middle Eastern Languages and Studies offers majors in Asian Studies and Chinese, minors in Arabic, Asian Studies, Chinese, and Japanese, as well as certificates in Arabic, Chinese and Japanese. The department also offers instruction in Hebrew, Hindi and Korean. These programs are designed to provide the language skills and cultural knowledge needed for a number of professions and careers.

Every semester the department offers several courses on topics such as literature, film and culture that are taught in English and utilize translated materials. These courses provide rigorous academic training for those interested in pursuing graduate studies and professional degrees. The popular minor and certificate programs complement most majors at the university.

The Bachelor of Arts in Asian Studies prepares students for careers that require linguistic proficiency and cultural knowledge. Students are required to take at least four semesters of Chinese, Japanese or Korean. Language courses are incorporated into a program of study comprising required and elective Asia-focused content courses in several disciplines, such as literature, religion, history, political science, sociology and anthropology. Careers that require or benefit from Asia-related expertise include government, education and business. The Asian Studies degree also prepares students for graduate programs in the humanities and social sciences as well as for professional schools in areas such as law and business.

Asian Studies majors are strongly encouraged to spend a semester or academic year studying abroad in a university program that combines language classes with courses focusing on culture and history—and to participate in the daily life of the host country.

Students may not combine the Asian Studies major with any of the following curricula: minor in Chinese, minor in Japanese, and may not double-major with Global Studies Global Cultures track. Students may double-major in Asian Studies and either the Economic Development or the Security tracks in the Global Studies major.
